

Senate Bill 707 Mental Health Law - Danger to the Life or Safety of the Individual or of Others - Definition (Right to Treatment)

Finance Committee

February 24, 2026

Position: UNFAVORABLE

The Mental Health Association of Maryland is a nonprofit education and advocacy organization that brings together consumers, families, clinicians, advocates and concerned citizens for unified action in all aspects of mental health and substance use disorders (collectively referred to as behavioral health). We appreciate the opportunity to provide this testimony in opposition to Senate Bill 707.

SB 707 defines “danger to the life or safety of the individual or others” for purposes of an emergency psychiatric evaluation and involuntary commitment to a psychiatric facility as including a non-imminent risk of potential future psychiatric/substantial deterioration.

Psychiatric Deterioration and Predicting Future Dangerousness

The U.S. Supreme Court holds that states may not confine to a hospital a “non-dangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends.”¹ SB 707 would define as “dangerous” those individuals at risk of substantial psychiatric deterioration. However, just because an individual’s mental health symptoms may be worsening does not necessarily make them a danger, nor does it mean involuntary hospitalization is the clinically appropriate level of care.

Predictions of future dangerousness are notoriously unreliable. Studies have consistently found that unstructured clinical assessments of future dangerousness are “accurate in no more than one out of three predictions”² and only “slightly more reliable than chance.”³ Adding the variable of “deterioration” and extending the potential danger to an unspecified distant future will increase the already high error rates of involuntary detention and commitment.

And if trained and experienced mental health professionals would struggle to accurately predict future dangerousness based on psychiatric deterioration, it seems reasonable to assume that law enforcement and lay persons would perform exponentially worse. While police officers may be able to assess, based on direct observation, whether a person is currently acting in a

¹ O'Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563 (1975).

² Monahan, J., Structured Risk Assessment of Violence, Textbook of Violence Assessment and Management 17, 20-21 (Simon and Tardiff eds., 2008).

³ See, e.g., In re the Detention of D.W., et. al. v. the Department of Social and Health Services, No. 90110-4 (Supreme Court of Washington, August 7, 2014) dangerous manner, they have no expertise to form a reasonable basis that someone is experiencing deterioration which will result in future dangerousness.

For more information, please contact Dan Martin at (410) 978-8865

With respect to lay persons, a petition for a psychiatric evaluation currently requires a description of the dangerous behavior that is believed related to mental illness, which enables a judge or district court commissioner to determine whether there is an objectively reasonable basis for involuntary detention. This review provides at least some minimum level of due process protection against speculative subjective opinions rendered by non-professionals. Under a “substantial deterioration” standard, however, petitions would have to be approved based precisely on such subjective speculation that a person’s mental health is declining and that this decline is an inherent danger to self or others.

BHA Involuntary Commitment Workgroup

In 2021, the Behavioral Health Administration (BHA) reviewed existing civil commitment laws and examined the definition of dangerousness. Over the course of several months, BHA and a diverse group of stakeholders discussed how to better define the language of civil commitment. The purpose of the meetings was to review national best practices on civil commitment and develop recommendations to provide greater clarity to Maryland’s civil commitment definition.

This was an inclusive process that included representatives from consumer and family advocacy organizations, behavioral health providers and professionals, legal rights organizations, individuals with lived experiences, hospitals, local system managers and others. The process resulted in a final report with several recommendations for improving the involuntary commitment process in Maryland, including a proposed definition of dangerousness to self or others. Notably, the group decided explicitly against recommending the inclusion of a psychiatric deterioration standard in the proposed definition.⁴

For these reasons, MHAMD opposes SB 707 and urges an unfavorable report.

⁴ Findings and recommendations regarding the definition of dangerousness begin on pg. 8. The discussion about the decision not to include psychiatric deterioration in the recommended definition begins near the middle of pg. 10.